Introduction to ILF Chief Executive, Patrick Boyle

As you may know, I recently commenced my new role as Chief Executive of the Independent Living Funds (ILF) and would like to take this opportunity to briefly introduce myself.

I have had a wide and varied career as a senior executive in health and social care, working in both the NHS and local Government in London. More recently, as Chief Executive of The Rent Service, (an Executive Agency of the Department for Work and Pensions) delivering housing benefit reform and in the Communities and Local Government Department leading the programme to establish the Equality and Human Rights Commission.

My new role as Chief Executive of the ILF presents an exciting opportunity to work with disabled people, our board of Trustees, our staff and other key stakeholders to lead the ILF to the next stage of its development. The ILF can point to many successes, notably its delivery of excellent customer service, demonstrated through Charter Mark accreditation and achieving high levels of customer satisfaction.

I am delighted to be joining an organisation that is already delivering such impressive results and I look forward to continuing this work to achieve real outcomes for disabled people and to make independent living a reality.
